Excerpt from Australia as It Really Is in Its Life, Scenery, and Adventure: The sadly-waning prospects of family affairs - a miserable necessity for retrenchment - the horrid bore of having at the age of twenty-one to begin to get my own living - and the difficulty of attaining that object in a community so thronged as England with fellow-competitors in the race for life - were among the most important considerations which directed my attention to the subject of Emigration. In the majority of similar cases ill health is, perhaps, the most fashionable motive to assign, and, indeed, I enjoyed enough of this to justify the customary plea; for England - moist, foggy, dear Old England! - does not possess precisely the climate best adapted for pulmonary predilections; but, if the truth must be told, poverty! unpopular poverty! and the plebeian hope of being able to better my worldly condition, were the real moving causes which urged this important subject seriously upon my attention.
