The tribes of this area may be classed as a semi-sedentary people, dwelling in villages along waterways, raising crops in extensive fields, and making use of the wild foods offered in considerable abundance. The familiar tipi or cone-shaped dwelling was missing in Louisiana. Instead there were a number of kinds of semi-permanent houses. In the southern part of the State was the palmetto house, a thatching of leaves over a framework of poles, with a single entrance and a smoke hole through the roof. In the north were still more pretentious houses, with framework of posts and poles, both round and square at the base, with domed roofs, plastered over with mud, and covered with palmetto leaves or grass, and finally with mats.
