Away at the end of the Rue Perelle, and standing in desolate solitude, as if waiting for the sleepy old town to catch up with it, is a dilapidated house. It is abandoned now, and it ought to have been so half a century ago. But it was not. Less than twenty years ago, had the townspeople been asked who lived there, they would have shrugged their shoulders and spread out their hands in good French fashion and said: An artist - an American. Pauvre diable! That was all they knew. He was an artist, and an American; so, of course, he was a poor devil. Clinton Hastings would have said something very like it, too, had his opinion of himself been asked. More especially had he been asked, one wild November night, as he sat with his eyes intently fixed on the easel before him. A young man, and a handsome one, too, in spite of the uncared for curling, brown beard which hid the whole lower part of his face.
