Sometimes the worst scars are those you cannot see----- P. Baker was a loner. He did not have a family. He did not, according to him, have a life until the age of sixteen. This is when he enlisted and fudged on his age. He needed a place to sleep, food and a feeling of security. He was a foster child, and had hardly any place to be other than a school where he felt safe for a few hours in the day. Baker knew it was screwed up. He tried to protect the younger ones. So when the chance came for him to leave. He took it. The fight for even one single thing would no longer be a problem for him. He had thought and executed his plan. He could not look back because he could not take another with him where he was going. It hurt. But he made a note to himself that when he got the chance, he would check on the others. And prayed that they would live and grow and become a better person than the idiots that ran the house. The Army became his family. These people were real. When they spoke Baker knew exactly what they meant and how to interpret it. No more guessing games. Regulated. From the back area of Texas, from the wrong side of the tracks (where that even came from confused him), but he was more or less a hillbilly when it came to lots of things. He was naive in lots of ways. But fighting was not one of them. His tone, his speech, his interpretations of people may be limited, but his mind was there...
