They, in their earnestness to hunt and harass the King s troops, got between the British main body and ?ank guard and there were shot dead. At night, after the British troops had ?ed, the bodies of these men were brought down the West Cambridge road, and across our Common to the grave yard, where their terrified and agonized relatives and neighbors hastily dug for them a common grave. Into that common grave they were thrown, their only covering their bloody battle garments. And SO they were buried. It was the first burial of men who fell in arms in our eight years Revolutionary War; and the men and women who stood by, holding the torches and viewing the sad sight, felt keenly and bitterly the want of those common methods and furnishings by which we endeavor to Show our respect and affection for the worthy dead. General Warren endeavored to comfort those neigh bors, friends, and relatives, by saying to them that the troubles of the land would soon be over, peace would come, and the proper thing Should be done in mem ory and honor of those whom now they must so bury. In less than two months, General Warren had himself gloriously fallen, in the same manner, in the same cause; and his promise descended with his honors to the generations following. Nearly one hundred years ago, Mr. Mayor, those men fell and were thus buried, and General...
