Excerpt from The Theological Eclectic Monthly, Vol. 3: A Series of Theological Papers Chiefly Selected From the Periodical and Other Literature of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Holland; July 1865 This instability Of the phenomena Of coloring, and the facility with which they are produced, identically the same in human populations otherwise very different, and manifested at times in a way altogether isolated in individuals, agree as little as possible with the nature of characters calculated to distinguish a species, and remind us in every respect, on the contrary, Of the facts which the characters Of race present. Moreover, we find it again, and in a yet more decided degree, in our domestic animals. In them, the skin where exposed presents variations Of tint not durable. The feet Of our ordinary hens are sometimes whitish, more usually slate-colored; they have become black, Olive, yellow, etc., in other races, some Of which are Of a very recent origin. The skin Of the body even is yellowish in the Cochin China hen; white in the Gallic; black in those dark species, which are...
