Excerpt from Proceedings of the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce: In Relation to the Improvement of the Navigation of the Mississippi River and Its Principal Tributaries and the St. Louis Harbor These snags are to be found in almost every part of the river, but they accumulate in greater numbers in bends, or where the current is obstructed by islands or sand bars. The pilots, generally, are perfectly familiar with every part of the river, knowing it as well as a boy does the way to his school house, yet their knowledge and skill do not at all times avail them. These snags, and other causes, divert the current, and the pilot is compelled to steer accordingly, and when he least thinks he is in danger, his boat strikes a snag, of which he is ignorant, and is lost. They also accumulate in great numbers where the channel is most obstructed, and instances have occurred on the Missouri, where boats were actually fenced in by them. Last summer, a boat ascended the Missouri and on her return, the water having fallen, the Captain was compelled to send his hands out and cut his way through the snags, there not being room to navigate between them. A channel, if well opened and kept open a short time, will remain so, for the water always deepens that part of it, and every snag on the sides, contributes to throw the water into the channel.
