He raised his eyes towards the aperture that served for a window as the face of Mark Clements appeared at it, and then turned half round upon his stool, without speaking. Good evening, said the lad, after a brief pause. The stranger did not speak or move. Our shipmate has gone to see your brother hermit, said Clements, with a smile. Ain t you mates? he inquired, after a pause, on finding that he received no reply. The stranger made an impatient movement, but remained silent. What is the other s name? inquired the provoking boy. At this question the man rose quickly, and strode towards the window with such a stern look upon his face that Clements drew back in haste, and retreated to the spot where Dale was waiting for him. But the lad misapprehended the convict s purpose. There was a wooden shutter, which ran in an internal groove, and this the man slid, closing the window against further intrusion, and securing the shutter with a pin made of a large nail. I can t get a word out of him, said Clements, as he joined his companion. He is another of the grey-shirted gentry; but I suppose they have quarrelled, as they can t agree even to live on the same side of the island. It is strange! said Dale; they probably came together, and yet, with no other neighbours or mates, they have...
