Each Easter, for 18 years past, the Tasmanian Field Naturalists Club has organised a camping trip to one or other of the coastal bays. Here the scientists can pursue their studies amidst Nature's realm, and the less scientific members can spend their time admiring the ways of the wild without probing too deeply into its secrets. Various localities have been visited, and the romance of the state's early history gives an added interest to such camping sites as Adventure Bay, Port Arthur, and Eaglehawk Neck; whilst for charm of scenery. Wineglass Bay, on Freycinet Peninsula (The Schoutens), will ever be remembered. It was here in 1914 that the record camp of one hundred members was held. The war era and the resultant economic position, however, have had their effect on the club's activities, and it has been found impossible to charter a steamer and have her at our disposal for the whole of the holidays. Within recent years, therefore, the club has had to conduct its camps nearer home. Last year Adventure Bay was chosen, and the locality proved so suitable that, in response to the expressed desire of many members, the committee decided to hold the camp there again this year. The success of the camp justified the selection. For many weeks before Easter the organisation work was in progress, as there are many details...
